A few forgotten May day traditions

May Birching

For centuries, our rural ancestors in northern and central England would wake up on May Day morning and look to see what sort of twig or flower had been left by or on their door. This custom was known as May Birching.

But what the house was festooned with was loaded with meaning and it wasn't always nice. For example, a thorn on your doormat was a message that you were not very popular (unless it was a hawthorn, which confusingly meant the opposite).

Aside from symbolism, your May morning message from the community could be in the form of a rhyme. If a pear was left, this was a compliment, as it rhymed with fair. If someone left wicken (rowan) out at your door they were calling you chicken, not as in a coward, but rather as a term of affection. A neighbour trying to call you a liar would leave briar.

Of all the May folk customs, the tradition of May Birching is very much a relic of our remote rustic past, when everyone in a village literally did know everyone else. It largely died out in the 19th century.

Collecting May Dew

Belief in the revitalising power of May dew is surely an ancient one. Catherine of Aragon observed the custom of collecting May dew in 1515, and clearly, the practice didn't start with her. The old convention is for young women and girls to go out well before dawn on May Day morning, collect dew from grass and hedges, and use it to wash their faces. The morning moisture was desirable throughout the whole of May but was thought to be most potent on May Day morning.

Anointing the face with May dew was not only considered lucky but was believed to be an effective beauty treatment, too. It was thought to keep the complexion youthful and clear any spots and blemishes. It was also held by many to be a powerful healing substance.

Samuel Pepys, in his diary entry for 10th May 1669, moaned that his wife and maidservants had woken him up about three in the morning while they were getting ready to collect May dew. He told them to be careful out and about at such an hour, then he went back to sleep.

May Singing

Every May Day, at 6am, a large crowd gathers around Magdalen Bridge in Oxford, including many on boats in the river, to see, or rather hear, an ancient tradition.

This is the May Singing at Magdalen College, part of the city's annual May Morning celebrations. Here, choristers sing a hymn and a madrigal to the delight of the thronging masses of locals and students below. Later in the day, local Morris dancers entertain those out and about in the city's main streets.

Magdalen's May Singing ritual is likely Tudor in origin, but in those days, it was practically a concert, kicking off at 4am with a lengthy playlist. One May morning in the late 18th century the choir was late to the tower and only had time for one hymn. Since that time the singing has been considerably shorter.
